The more serious nature of error in youth is in the fact, that habit being powerful and character being in a transition state and unfixed, there is a hability of evil rather than good being perpetuated. To break loose from an evil habit takes more i ree and decision of will to accomplish than to avoid its inception and formation in the first place. There are certain substances that absorb into themselves all gaseous fluids, or moisture around them, and if they are impregnated with poisons, so will those substances partake of poisons likewise. So we may say of the young; association and training having a most powerful influence over their after career. They are certain to partake more or less of the nature, the characteristics and the amusements of those they mingle with, unless they are of that positive station to assist them, are like they say soggle visits are "few and far between."
